

HISTORY

AMDA first opened its doors in New York City in 1964 as The American Musical and Dramatic Academy with the renowned theatre director, producer, teacher and Shakespeare scholar Philip Burton as AMDA's first director. AMDA's philosophy is that the training of all performing artists — whether they be actors, singers or dancers — is greatly enhanced by including an immersive, multidisciplinary curriculum. AMDA was at the forefront of delivering this innovative concept of “cross training.” The institution quickly established itself as an integral part of the New York performing arts community, garnering early support from Broadway's theatre elite.

After Philip Burton retired, David Martin and Jan Martin took the reins as co-presidents, taking AMDA to national prominence as one of the nation's premier performing arts institutions. Under their leadership, AMDA grew exponentially in both size and scope, developing innovative programs of study while achieving national accreditation with the National Association of Schools of Theatre (NAST).

MISSION

AMDA provides rigorous, performance-based training and an industry-focused education experience; one that inspires excellence and prepares artists with an appreciation for the universal power of transformation through art. AMDA's educational philosophy is based on close collegial interaction between instructors and students — in class, in production and through active mentorship.

AMDA is committed to providing an unsurpassed performing arts education to a diverse community of creative artists. AMDA serves as both school and stage, where students are given the support and opportunity to define their own personal objectives and to develop and refine their own distinctive artistic voices.

AMDA strives to create an environment for students to develop the skills, confidence, imagination, and power to contribute to their community as artists, entrepreneurs, visionaries, lifelong learners, and conscientious citizens of the world. Above all, AMDA wants to teach students that commitment and passion are the hallmarks of a successful and joyous career.
